

When I got on the Black Canyon IOOK website the day before the race, I was just planning to review the course profile and just generally get mentally ready for the race. What I discovered was that the race course was being changed due to heavy rains and resulting high waters in the Agua Fria river. My spam filter had blocked the notification sent a couple of days earlier.

The original course was a point-to-point race with a net elevation loss of almost 2,000 feet. The new course would be an out-and-back with almost twice the elevation gain. The good news was that it would still be accepted by Western States as a qualifier. But given the rain and additional elevation gain, I became more worried about making the 17-hour Western States qualifying time that I had failed to make last year on an easier, dry course.

There seemed to be few no-shows despite the rain that was coming down steadily when the race began. After the first couple of miles of roads, we turned onto a trail that was already so muddy that parts of it were barely runnable. Remarkably, the only real grumblings I heard all day were just concerns about the damage that we might be doing to the trail in such conditions. The runner's good spirits were a real credit to the improvised planning by the organizers, volunteers and runners.

One nice thing about the alternative course was getting to see the race leaders as they headed inbound. As they began to filter back past me, the rain had stopped which revealed some spectacular views of clouds and the surrounding hills.

It was completely dark before I got to the Hidden Treasure aid station (inbound) at mile 49. The pause from running started me shivering and it took a half-mile or so out of the aid station, pushing a little harder than usual, before that stopped. The trail conditions were fine all the way back to Antelope Mesa. At the next aid station, however I began shivering badly and it was only the knowledge that I was well within reach of making a sub-17-hour finish (and a WS qualifier) that got me back onto the trail.

The last five miles were miserably slow through shoe-sucking mud and ankle deep puddles that didn't allow me to keep moving fast enough to stop shivering. It was a relief to get to the final two miles of road, and an even bigger relief to get to the finish line under 17 hours and into the warmth of the high school.

Alex Nichols of Colorado Springs and Elov Olsson of Sweden earned their Golden Tickets to Western States by finishing first and second. Their sub-eight-hour times were made extra impressive given the muddy conditions for significant portions of the course. On the women's side, 2016 Leadville champ Clare Gallagher of Boulder came second to Nicole Kalogeropoulos of Dallas to punch their two tickets.

The entire event, and the elite race in particular, is documented nicely in a video posted by Aravaipa Running and produced by Steep Life Media. Golden Tickets – The Hard Way is available on YouTube.

As impressive as those elite finishing times were, I was most impressed by the twenty-plus runners who finished after 17 hours. Many of them must have known at Antelope Mesa that they weren't going to make a Western States qualifying time. Given the conditions, they showed some real grit to push through to the finish. They may not have gotten a Golden Ticket, but they definitely got a Black Canyon 100K finish the hard way.
